

We firstly give a short motivation for the idea of bio-inspired computing in general. Afterward we present the concept of Networks of Evolutionary: basic definitions, equivalence to Turing machines and other universal computational models and give examples of some problems that can be solved using this types of networks. Finally we present some open problems regarding the implementation of other bio-inspired rules (splicing, for example) or other, more rigid, communication protocols between the processors.